MONDAY EVENING, OCT. 10, 1892.

A SNAKE WITH A BABE'S HEAD.—Jonathan Baker, while working on his farm near Coaling, Ohio, heard a strange hissing sound coming from a log pile. Wondering what it could be, he removed the logs one by one. After several had been removed he was horrified to see a mighty serpent, with a head resembling that of a babe, spring up. Back from the low forehead coursed an abundance of soft hair, and beneath the wrinkled brow peered eyes of evil. From its lips darted a forked tongue, as the monster fully eight feet long, and as thick as a man's thigh, tried to spring upon the farmer. Mr. Baker called a friend, Joseph McCartney, who was working near. Both took their axes and one struck the monster a blow on the back of its head, while the other tackled its body. The brute writhed and emitted in horrible agony, and the sound it made as it writhed was like the howling of a dog. It was a powerful tail, but the man kept clear of it until the snake was dispatched by repeated blows. Mr. Baker says that McCartney will testify to the truth of his assertions.

MICE ATE UP HIS FORTUNE.—Edward Kelly, an aged farmer living near Griffin's Corners, N. Y., is known in the neighborhood as somewhat of a miser. He places no faith in banks or securities except greenbacks. Some time ago he sold a tract of land for a large sum of money, which he added to his accumulated hoard, making in all nearly $8,000.

Last week he had occasion to examine his treasure, which he kept secreted in an old boot box concealed among a quantity of newspapers. He was surprised to find that some mice had entirely destroyed his fortune in preparing for themselves winter quarters. Not a piece of the money was left large enough for identification. The old man raved like a maniac when he discovered his loss.
